Furnishing the Spare Bed Room

Woman of Original Ideas Can Produce Artistic Results with Small Means.

There was once a woman who had a very ugly room. She called it her spare room—and spare it was indeed in the scanty sense of the word. She never went into it if she could help it, and she shuddered at the thought of trying to make a guest comfortable therein. She had had one once, but that guest had never returned. Could it have been the dingy room?

To begin with, it had a hard-looking, old-looking Cashmere rug in terra cotta and yellow. It also had some ineradicable grease spots upon it, accenting the most noticeable part of the design. The paper was red and the woodwork was dirty white. There was a cheap oak bed and dresser and a tippy-looking oak rocker. The woman hated to go into this room, to which the guest had never come back. Then one day the woman went a-visiting. She visited in a dear little town where there were many modest but mightily attractive little homes. And visiting ladies are always treated right royally in dear little towns. So the woman had many chances of seeing inside of tastefully furnished living rooms, pretty dining rooms and dainty bedrooms. Particularly was she impressed by the bedrooms. And she thought of her ugly spare room at home. After a while she began to wonder if she could spare the money to make a dainty bedroom of it, too. Then she began to hunt for ideas. Whenever she saw something particularly dainty in one of these dainty bedrooms, she made a note of it, determining to have something just like it. She made many determinations. One was that even if she couldn't get everything at once for that spare room of hers, she would begin at once anyway, and work away on it if it took her a year. Another was that she would try not to use a single red-oak-Cashmere-thing in that old spare room.

She could hardly wait to get home so that she might begin operations. Her mightiest resolution had been that she would repaper the room herself. Everybody did in her modest little town, and she had received copious directions. And so armed with these, and many rolls of 10-cent paper, she proudly set to work.

The paper was very pretty—she had indulged in her fancy for dainty rosebuds, and she had read in the newspaper once that spare rooms could be as flowery as one wished—just because they were spare rooms and no one could get tired of them.

She carefully scraped off all the old paper—she gave her woodwork a new coat of white paint, and the walls were charming with their fresh rosy paper. The ceiling and drop were tinted pure white, and her husband was pressed into service here. (Though she could really have done it herself.)

She then bought a pink-and-white rag rug for $1.75. And as this rug was really rather small, she carefully stained the floor all over. She chose a dark oak stain.

And it was such fun to do the rest of it—even though it did take her several months.

She bought—by degrees—a bed spring, which she mounted on feet. This is more comfortable than a cot bed. She bought, to begin with, a pad mattress for $2. This she tied on to the spring with tapes fastened in the middle. These mattresses are surprisingly comfortable. From the wooden frame of the bedspring she suspended a ruffle of white muslin which reached the floor. This was a tape on a tape and fastened up with tapes so that it could be easily removed for tubbing.

Then she bought pink linen for a couch cover; this was made wide and long enough to drop over one foot, still showing a goodly amount of white ruffle. She finally covered two sleeping pillows with white and laid them on the linen cover.

At the window she hung sheer plain white muslin curtains and a white shade.

She bought a chiffonier second-hand for $2.50 and stained it medium green. She bought a new straight-legged table and stained it green, too. This was to be for a dressing table. She found a slightly antique mirror at the second-hand store for 50 cents, and paid another 50 cents to have it re-silvered. The frame of this she stained green, too.

She bought a new Windsor armchair for $3.75 and stained it white, and a little old-fashioned kitchen chair for the dressing table for $1.50. And she had all the furniture she actually needed.

With the pink linen she made a cover for the dressing table, one for the chiffonier, and a tie-on cushion pad for each chair. Such a complete little room you never did see. But perhaps if you're good, you'll be invited some time, as I was.

For I was the very first guest in this rosy guest room, and it was so very rosy and I was so very happy I asked my hostess to grant me the privilege of telling you this story of her room.

And as this is the time for bargains, you will be doubly appreciative, I know.

There is not a day that passes that does not offer some new trick in the world of fashion, and here, this vaingoddess offers the latest novelty accessory! It is the bracelet bouquet holder. To be sure, a treasure for the woman with a round dimpled arm, for it is a snake, with a jeweled head, in Roman gold. The bouquet of delicate colored sweet peas with metal covered stems is held firmly in place by the armlet which is not too snug. This is sure to be a popular novelty, for having one's bouquet on the arm protects it from being crushed, or from discoloring the bodice of one's gown, as so often happens. Aside from these practical reasons, it ought to be popular for the mere fact that it gives a coquettish saucy finishing touch to one's outfit.
